I want to share something that I recently learned while participating in a RootsTech class. The class was about writing your life story. This is different than a journal, diary or chronological timeline. The object of writing your or an ancestor's life story is to ponder and review your life and pick out stories or events that changed your life. Then instead of focusing on the things leading up to the life changing event explore the feelings you experienced, the blessings you received and the lessons you learned. Difficult life changing events are often the most instructive. Don't be afraid to share these chapters in your life. Write from an expanded point of view looking back at how you have grown because of this event. Then write to your children or grandchildren as if they had gathered for your 100th birthday and you are leaving them your legacy.
